SET UP ONCE

Four prompts. Three chats.

Every prompt here runs in ChatGPT, Claude, or Gemini. The setup matters as much as the prompts, so do this part properly:

Chat 1, Setup. Run Prompt 01, then Prompt 02, in the same chat. This finds your lane and builds your offer.

Chat 2, Awareness Stories. A dedicated chat. Paste Prompt 03 once. From then on you drop voice notes instead of typing.

Chat 3, Conversion Stories. A separate dedicated chat, one per offer. Paste Prompt 04 once, offer included. From then on you just ask for however many scripts you want.

Keeping these separate matters. Mix awareness and conversion prompts in one thread and the AI blends the two tones into something that does neither job well.

Pin your chats so you never lose them

Once a chat is set up, pin it. You will come back to the same chats every single time you make content, and an unpinned chat disappears down the list within a week. This is what mine looks like:

Notice the naming. I keep separate storytelling chats per audience, because the same story told to a founder and to a salaried professional needs different language.

You do not need seven. Start with the three on this page, name them plainly, pin them.

Find Your Lane

Finds the lane where you have zero resistance. Works whether you have done this for a decade or have never posted once, because it adapts to what you actually tell it instead of assuming you are an expert.

PASTE INTO A NEW CHAT

You are a positioning strategist who specializes in finding my "zero-resistance" content lane: the specific angle I could talk about endlessly without running out of things to say. This works whether I have decades of experience or none at all. Meet me exactly where I am. Do not assume my expertise.

Ask me these questions one at a time, and wait for my answer before the next one:

1. What field, industry, or interest am I spending most of my time on right now, as work, as a hobby, or as something I'm learning?
2. What do people already come to me for advice or opinions on, without me offering?
3. What could I talk about for 10 minutes with zero prep, even if I'm not "credentialed" in it?
4. What mistake or misconception do I notice constantly in that space?
5. What opinion do I hold about that space that others might disagree with?

Once I have answered all five, give me back:

- My zero-resistance lane, as one specific sentence
- 3 content pillars underneath that lane
- Why this lane will out-perform a generic "here is what I do" angle, matched honestly to the experience level I actually described

WHAT GOOD LOOKS LIKE

Lane: "What I learned managing a team's time when nobody respected boundaries."

Pillars: saying no without guilt, how burnout starts before you notice, busy versus effective.

WHAT GREAT LOOKS LIKE, WHEN YOU ANSWER DEEPER

The difference is entirely in your answers. Give it a real disagreement and a real mistake instead of a safe one, and you get this instead:

Lane: "Why the most organised person on your team is usually the one closest to quitting."

Pillars: (1) the competence trap, where being reliable quietly becomes being exploited, (2) the difference between a workload problem and a boundary problem, and why most people misdiagnose it, (3) what to say in the meeting where the extra work gets handed to you.

Why it is stronger: it names a specific person in a specific moment, it takes a position somebody could argue with, and every pillar is a conversation rather than a category. Vague answers give you vague lanes. Go first, and it will follow you.

Build The Offer

Turns your lane into offers you can actually deliver. It does not hand you our prices, it generates the right tiers for your situation.

PASTE INTO THE SAME CHAT AS PROMPT 01

You are a business architect who builds offers out of my real experience, not generic templates. Whether I am a complete beginner or have years behind me, build something I can credibly deliver right now.

BEFORE YOU SEND THIS: replace everything inside [square brackets] below with your own answers. Delete the brackets too. The prompt will not work properly if you send it with the placeholders still in it.

Here is my zero-resistance lane and background:
[PASTE YOUR ANSWER FROM PROMPT 01]

Time I've spent in this space: [X]

What I have actually done, and results I've gotten for myself or for other people (personal results count, this does not have to be paid client work): [LIST]

Give me:

1. Three offer concepts at three price points: a low-ticket digital product, a mid-ticket group offer, and a high-ticket 1:1 or done-for-you. Match each one honestly to my experience level and do not suggest anything I cannot deliver.
2. For each offer: the one-sentence promise, who it is for, and who it is explicitly NOT for.
3. Which of the three I should launch first, and why, based on the fastest path from "no product" to "first sale."

WHAT GOOD LOOKS LIKE

Low ($9 to $27): a template pack of the system you already use. Mid ($97 to $297): a live cohort with feedback. High ($500+): 1:1 implementation.

Launch first: low-ticket, because it proves you can sell before you build something bigger.

WHAT GREAT LOOKS LIKE, WHEN YOU ANSWER DEEPER

Feed it specific outcomes instead of a job title, and the offers stop being categories and start being things people recognise they need:

Low ($19): "The Handover Scripts." The seven exact messages to send when work is being pushed onto you, so you stop rehearsing the conversation at 1am. Not for people who want to be liked by everyone.

Mid ($197): a 3-week group where you audit their actual calendar and rebuild it live, because most people know the theory and still cannot apply it to their own week.

High ($850): you sit in on their real team's planning cycle and redesign how work gets assigned.

Launch first: the $19 scripts, because it solves the single sharpest pain in the lane, it takes a weekend to make, and everyone who buys it has just told you they have the bigger problem the $197 offer solves.

How attention actually moves through a human mind

The five stages inside Prompts 03 and 04 are not a creative choice. Each one hooks something the brain does automatically, whether your viewer wants it to or not. Knowing why they work changes how well you deliver them on camera.

1. Hook and Open Loop: the curiosity gap.

An unresolved question gets filed by the brain as unfinished work it cannot put down. A specific, unexplained micro-scenario opens that loop. Attention is not won by being loud. It is won by being incomplete.

2. The Mirror: retention through recognition.

People do not keep watching your content, they keep watching themselves. The second a detail matches a hidden anxiety of theirs, recognition fires before judgement does. "Wait, is this about me?" is what holds them past the three-second mark.

3. Emotional Reframe: loss aversion.

A potential loss lands roughly twice as hard as an equivalent gain. Naming what their inaction is quietly costing, in time and momentum and market share, recruits that bias on the side of action instead of comfort.

4. Cognitive Dissonance: identity pressure.

People work hard to stay consistent with how they see themselves. Showing the gap between "I am capable" and "I am still exactly where I was in January" creates a discomfort the mind wants resolved now, not next quarter.

5. Identity and Loop Closing: resolution.

The loop from stage one finally closes, but only by them stepping into a new identity. This is what makes the video feel finished rather than preachy, and it is the part they carry around after the screen goes dark.

This is why the frame works on a stranger who has never heard your name. It is not persuasion by information. It is persuasion by attention mechanics that exist in every human brain, including yours.

Awareness Storytelling

Turns a raw spoken thought into a sub-60-second script using the five stages you just read. This is what earns attention from people who have never heard of you.

START A BRAND NEW CHAT FOR THIS

Paste the prompt on the next page once. After that, stop typing your stories. Open the mic in the chat and talk, exactly as messy as it comes out of your head. Speaking is faster than writing, and it keeps the story sounding like you instead of like an essay you edited four times.

Message...

Use the mic, not the keyboard.

Hit the microphone in your chat's message bar and just talk. Every voice note you drop into this chat comes back as a full content package.

On the timing: the script is written to read in under a minute, but your actual recording will often run to 90 seconds or more once you add pauses, gestures, and the way you naturally emphasise things. That is not a mistake and it is not you doing it wrong. Do not rush your delivery to hit an arbitrary number. What matters is the final cut after your edit: keep that under three minutes, so it reaches a larger audience.

WHAT COMES BACK

Hook: "I watched someone spend six months redesigning their offer instead of posting one honest video about it."

Mirror: "If you have rewritten your bio four times this year but have not hit publish once..."

Overlays: "6 months." / "0 posts." / "One honest video beats both."

Caption CTA: "Comment MAP and I'll send you the exact one I used."

Plus: keyword, 3 hashtags, comment 1, comment 2.

AWARENESS STORYTELLING · MY ACTUAL WORKING PROMPT

You are an elite content strategist and psychological storytelling coach specializing in the consumer behavior framework. Your audience is people who want to get their expertise, their ideas, and their real lives onto social media and talk about them without overthinking it. Some of them have decades of experience. Some are just starting. Meet each story where it is.

Your job is to take raw, messy, real-life stories, ideas, or experiences and transform them into short, high-converting, deeply piercing "yap session" video scripts. The goal is to psychologically corner the viewer, forcing them to confront the exact things they are delaying or overcomplicating.

Structure every narrative transformation using these 5 stages:

1. THE HOOK AND OPEN LOOP

Start with a highly specific, low-friction micro-scenario ("I was looking at a client's workflow the other day..." or "I noticed this weird trap people fall into..."). Introduce a glaring contradiction or objection immediately to open a massive cognitive loop.

2. THE MIRROR (Relatability)

Paint a vivid picture of the character in the story that directly mirrors the viewer's hidden anxieties, imposter syndrome, or stagnation. Make them say, "Wait, is this person talking about me?"

3. THE EMOTIONAL REFRAME (Anticipatory Regret and Loss Aversion)

Deliver the core realization. Force them to look at the math of their inaction. Show them that while they are busy figuring out the tech or doubting their positioning, time is burning and they are actively choosing future regret over temporary discomfort.

4. COGNITIVE DISSONANCE (The Cornering Effect)

Strip away the excuses. Break down the illusion that they need to be an engineer or need more credentials. Put their current actions in direct conflict with the identity they hold of themselves. Show them they are not stuck, they are hiding behind complexity.

5. IDENTITY AND LOOP CLOSING

Close the loop with an authoritative, perspective-shifting realization. Give them total agency: their mind is the prize, the tools are the engine, and the only missing variable is their decision to step into the role they have been circling.

STYLE AND TONE DIRECTIVES:

- Format: yap session style. Conversational, punchy, rhythmic, authentic.
- Pacing: vary sentence lengths. Short, sharp, declarative truths mixed with longer compounding thoughts that build momentum.
- Diction: zero corporate jargon, zero generic fluff. Talk like a brilliant, grounded peer holding up an uncomfortable mirror in a late-night conversation.
- Flow: the move from the specific anecdote to the viewer's own reality must feel seamless and impossible to dodge.

THE 60-SECOND RULE, THIS IS A HARD LIMIT:

Every script you write must be speakable in under 60 seconds at a natural, unrushed pace. That is roughly 140 to 160 spoken words. If a draft runs longer, cut it down yourself before you show it to me. Never hand me a script I would have to rush to fit.

From here on, every voice note I drop into this chat is a raw story or observation. For each one, give me:

1. The full script, broken into the 5 stages, inside the 60-second limit above
2. 3-5 text overlays, in the order they appear on screen
3. A caption, 2-4 sentences, ending in a soft CTA to comment a keyword
4. 3 hashtags
5. Comment 1: the keyword prompt I pin as the first comment. Keep the keyword to one easy word, like MAP, GUIDE, or AUDIT. One word is faster to type than a phrase, which is exactly why it converts better than "comment send me the guide."
6. Comment 2: a follow-up comment for engagement, posted 10-15 minutes later

Conversion Storytelling

Completely different input from Prompt 03. No stories, no voice notes. This one starts from your offer and writes the scripts that sell it, several at a time.

START ANOTHER NEW CHAT, ONE PER OFFER

Paste the prompt on the next page once, with your offer inside it. That single message sets up the whole chat. After that you never paste it again. You just ask, in plain language, for what you want:

"Give me 5 scripts across 3 different angles."
"Give me 3 more scripts, different angle, same offer."
"Give me 5 scripts, 4 contexts, full packages."

Every script comes back complete: the 5-stage script, the overlays, the caption, 3 hashtags, and both comments. Every angle is a different way into the same offer and the same core message, never a different offer. When you launch something new, start a fresh chat for it.

Same timing note applies: these read in under a minute, but expect your recording to run longer once you are actually talking, gesturing and emphasising. Let it. Just keep the final cut, after your edit, under three minutes so it reaches a larger audience.

WHAT COMES BACK, PER SCRIPT

Angle: the "I don't want to look salesy" objection.

Hook: "A client told me she would rather stay stuck than look salesy."

Reframe: "Staying quiet is not neutral. It is a decision to let someone less qualified take the client who needed you."

Overlay: "Silence has a cost too."

Caption CTA: "Comment START and I'll send you the link."

Plus: 3 hashtags, comment 1, comment 2.

CONVERSION STORYTELLING · ONE CHAT PER OFFER

You are an elite content strategist and psychological storytelling coach specializing in the consumer behavior framework. This chat is dedicated to one offer, and your only job here is to write short-form video scripts that convert viewers into buyers of it.

Use the same 5-stage frame throughout: Hook and Open Loop, Mirror, Emotional Reframe, Cognitive Dissonance, Identity and Loop Closing. But reorient every stage around the offer rather than a personal memory. The "story" is the transformation the offer creates, told through a composite person, not something that happened to me.

Here is the offer this entire chat is about:

[PASTE YOUR OFFER FROM PROMPT 02: what it is, who it is for, the price, what is included, and the transformation it creates]

HOW I WILL USE THIS CHAT:

From now on I will simply ask you for a number of scripts and a number of angles, for example "give me 5 scripts across 3 angles." Every angle is a different entry point into the SAME offer and the SAME core message: a different objection, a different audience type, a different moment of frustration, a different desired outcome. Never change the offer itself. Never make me paste it again.

THE 60-SECOND RULE, THIS IS A HARD LIMIT:

Every script you write must be speakable in under 60 seconds at a natural, unrushed pace. That is roughly 140 to 160 spoken words. If a draft runs longer, cut it down yourself before you show it to me. This applies to every single script, including when I ask for many at once.

FOR EVERY SINGLE SCRIPT YOU RETURN, ALWAYS INCLUDE ALL SIX:

1. The angle it is taking, named in a few words
2. The full script broken into the 5 stages, inside the 60-second limit above, ending on a direct, unambiguous call to action
3. 3-5 text overlays in the order they appear on screen
4. A caption, 2-4 sentences, ending with the same CTA as the script and a one-word keyword, for example "comment START and I'll send the link"
5. 3 hashtags
6. Comment 1 (the one-word keyword prompt) and Comment 2 (an urgency or social-proof follow-up posted 10-15 minutes later)

Vary the hooks hard across scripts. If two scripts open in a similar way, rewrite one of them. Never return a script missing any of the six elements above, even when I ask for many at once.

Package and Auto-Deliver

There is no script to write here. LinkDM and ManyChat already handle the conversation and the follow-ups for you. This page is the wiring: making sure the thing you sell lands in someone's inbox the second they comment, while you are asleep.

1. Turn your offer into one deliverable. A PDF, a Notion page, a video link, a course link. Whatever the low-ticket offer from Prompt 02 actually is, get it down to a single file or a single link.
2. Connect that link to the post inside LinkDM or ManyChat. Set the trigger word to the exact keyword from Comment 1 of your script.
3. The moment someone comments that word, it lands in their DM. No manual sending, no checking your phone, no lost lead because you were busy.
4. The follow-up is already built into the tool. Both platforms ship with their own nudge and follow-up sequencing. You configure it once inside the app. You do not need a separate script for this, which is exactly why there isn't one in this blueprint.

Why this is the last piece, not a bonus one.

Prompts 01 through 04 get you attention and scripts that sell. This page is what makes sure the sale actually gets delivered without you sitting on your phone all day.

Skip it and you have a content system. Build it and you have an income system.

You already own everything you need to start.

The most common reason people never post is not the script. It is the quiet belief that they need to buy things first. A ring light. A microphone. A better camera. A backdrop. The shopping list becomes the hiding place, and six months disappear inside it.

Here is exactly what I use.

My phone. That is the whole list.

No external microphone. No ring light. No artificial lighting of any kind. I film facing a window and let the sunlight do the work. The videos that brought in 10K followers and $10,000 were shot this way.

What actually improves the video, for free

- Face the light, do not stand in front of it. A window in front of you is flattering. A window behind you turns you into a silhouette.
- Film where you already live. I mostly use my kitchen or my living room, because that is what is there and it is all I need. Rooms you actually live in have things in them, and things absorb echo, which is what makes phone audio sound cheap. A big empty room is the real audio problem, not your microphone.
- Hold the phone at eye level, not below it. Prop it on books if you have to.
- Wipe the lens. It lives in your pocket. This single second does more for image quality than most paid gear.

When gear is actually worth it: a microphone if your only filming space genuinely echoes, and a light if your schedule means you can only ever record after dark. Both are solutions to a specific problem you have already run into. Neither is a prerequisite, and neither belongs anywhere near your first thirty posts. Start with the phone in your hand today.

The apps, and what each one actually is

If you have never heard of any of these, start here. Each one gets a plain explanation first, then what it does for you, then a tutorial. The web address is printed in full so you can type it in if tapping the link does not work in your PDF reader.

Simple Teleprompter

What it is: a phone app that scrolls your script down the screen while you record, the same way news readers read the news without looking down at paper.

What it does for you: you look straight into the camera the whole time instead of glancing at notes, so you sound prepared rather than rehearsed. Paste in the script the AI gave you and press record.

How to use it: youtu.be/oA7T3uzVdy4

LinkDM and ManyChat

What they are: two separate apps that do the same job. They connect to your Instagram account and watch your posts. When somebody comments a word you have chosen, the app automatically sends that person a direct message for you.

What they do for you: this is the whole Package and Auto-Deliver page, running by itself. Someone comments MAP at 2am, they get your link at 2am, without you awake. Pick whichever of the two is available and sensibly priced where you live. You only need one.

LinkDM: youtu.be/be0I629IZIE

ManyChat: youtu.be/xKp_QqMbxCc

Instagram Edits

What it is: a free video editing app made by Instagram itself, separate from the main Instagram app. You download it on its own.

What it does for you: trims the dead air off your recording, adds the text overlays the AI wrote for you, and puts captions on automatically. Because Instagram makes it, it does not stamp a watermark on your video the way most free editors do.

How to use it: youtu.be/wfYFQ-WGx3k

Trial Reels

What it is: not an app. It is a setting inside Instagram itself, chosen at the moment you post a reel.

What it does for you: it shows that reel only to people who do not follow you, and hides it from the people who do. So you can test a hook on strangers without your existing audience watching you experiment. If it performs, Instagram pushes it out properly. If it flops, almost nobody you know ever saw it.

How it actually behaves in 2026

- Your followers do not see it in their feed, grid, or Reels tab, though anyone with post notifications turned on, or who finds the same audio elsewhere, still can.
- The old fixed 72-hour window is gone. A trial that performs gets pushed to your followers soon after, based on view and engagement signals.
- A trial that flops does not drag down your normal reels. They are scored independently, which is the entire point of using them.
- Roughly 5 trial reels a day is the cap. Re-posting an identical clip with only a new caption, filter, or audio gets flagged as duplicate content.
- Recycling old clips works, and is smart, but it has to be a genuine re-edit: new hook, re-cut opening, recombined segments. Not a straight re-upload.

How to use it with this blueprint.

Ask Prompt 03 or 04 for the same script with two or three different hooks. Post each one as a separate trial reel, about 24 hours apart so they are not competing for the same pool of non-followers. Whichever hook wins, push that one to everybody.

This is how you find out what works without burning your audience's patience learning it.

How to use it: youtu.be/3ijOEoaXpBw

Now go and make the first one.

Set up the three chats today. Pin them. Record one voice note into Chat 2 and post whatever comes back, even if it is not perfect. The system compounds from the first post, not the fortieth.
